Updated tool explores trends in community investments for states, metros and counties

The Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis recently updated its Community Investment Explorer, an interactive tool that aggregates investments into low- and moderate-income (LMI) communities. The 2019 update includes the ability to conduct county-level analysis.

Explorer draws on publicly available data from over 500,000 investment transactions through the Community Development Financial Institution, New Markets Tax Credit and Low-Income Housing Tax Credit programs.

Investments support a range of activities: from affordable housing, to commercial real estate development, to consumer and business lending and more. Collectively, these programs are responsible for several billion dollars of investment annually into LMI communities.
